Introduction

By Caitlin Condell

Welcome to a world of fragile beasts! In the pages of this book, you will encounter creatures real and imagined, created by artists working hundreds of years ago. Within the designs you'll recognize butterflies, snails, birds, rabbits, and dogs. As you color, you will find that strange and mysterious creatures abound—a man with plants for legs; a critter with the spiraling shell of a hermit crab, pincers of a scorpion, hooves of a stag, and the tail of a peacock; a two-legged monster with the head of a bull; and a snail that has alligator heads in place of feet, just to name a few of the more uncommon forms.

In the sixteenth and seventeenth century, European artists who produced these magical creatures had a name for them—grotesques. The word grotesque suggests many things in modern language, but its origin dates to late fifteenth-century Italy, where grottesche translated literally as “of the grotto.” The term was coined to refer to images found on the walls of ancient structures that had been buried, including Nero’s grand pleasure palace, the Domus Aurea. Lowered into the dirt-filled chambers of the palace, Renaissance artists discovered wall paintings of slender architectural elements framing or transforming into foliage that morphed into human, animal, and mythological forms. From this discovery, the genre of the grotesque was born. This fantastic style enabled artists to invent creatures that pushed the boundaries of the known world. At the end of this book, you can learn more about the prints and drawings from which these beasts originate, all of which are housed in the collection of the Department of Drawings, Prints & Graphic Design at Cooper Hewitt, Smithsonian Design Museum.

Over the next forty pages, elements of nature are transformed into otherworldly beings. Many centuries after they were created, it is time to transform them even more by bringing these fearsome and playful creatures from the Age of Exploration to life with color!
